

Using naturally shed antlers, Jeff Musgrave makes eye-catching, life-sized elk, deer and moose sculptures as well as many kinds of home furnishings.

Antler Artist Creates Life-Sized Sculptures

Jeff Musgrave of Divide, Colo., uses naturally shed antlers from white tail deer, mule deer, elk and moose to create chandeliers, lamps, home furnishings, and even life-sized statues. He calls his business "The Peak Antler Company," and he sells his "art" all over the world.

Musgrave can also incorporate antiques, barrels, single trees, snowshoes, wagon wheels, bronze sculptures, rawhide and other items into his creations.

He has been in the business for over 11 years and purchases the antlers by the pound from several dealers. He says the cost depends on size, type and quality, with prices ranging $6 to $22 per pound.

Musgrave sometimes works with antlers that are supplied by his clients, but says it "takes such a large selection of antlers to find the ones that fit together just perfectly, that most people don't have enough antlers to do the job.

"The antlers in my finished pieces are screwed together with heavy lag screws," he explains. "Each antler has to be pre-drilled and set with at least 3 screws each. The trick is in how to hide your tracks and conceal the screws."

The wiring for Musgrave's UL-listed chandeliers and lamps is concealed inside the antlers themselves, thanks to a method he came up with for drilling them out.

His chandeliers range in price from $1,195 to $17,995.

After years of being asked how he does his work, he has produced a video entitled, "How To Build an Antler Chandelier". It sells for $29.75 plus shipping.

He also makes chairs, stools, benches and glass-topped tables, all with strong antler bases. Prices for these items range from $725 to $3,500 each.

Eye-catching, life-sized elk, mule deer or moose sculptures - made from antlers - are another thing that Peak Antler Company is known for. Musgrave uses a combination of various antler types to create a 9-ft. tall, likeness of one of those animals in a custom pose. He charges $25,000 (plus S&H) per sculpture and requires 8 to 10 weeks to complete each project.

Home furnishings made from antlers include lamps (above) and chandeliers.

This giant sculpture of semis, called Big Rig Jig, was created by New York sculpture artist Mike Ross. People could enter at the bottom and climb to the top.

Semi Tankers Turned Into Giant Artwork

What looked like a pair of semi tankers somersaulting through the air was actually a popular artwork at a festival called Burning Man held recently at the Black Rock Desert of Nevada. More than 47,000 people attended the 8-day festival this past summer. The sculpture of semis called Big Rig Jig was created by New York sculpture artist Mike Ross. With the help of friends, he reworked the semis, cutting them apart and recombining the empty shells with a skeletal structure of pipe and beams.

Sarah Wittman, a Seattle resident, attended the festival. "You could climb inside, all the way to the top. There were no stairs or anything, just the welding they did to hold it together."

Wittman was not alone as a steady stream of visitors explored the 38-ft. tall truck-art. Like all structures at the unusual festival, the semis were dismantled and removed within a month after the event ended.
